

The Zen garden in the Ryoan-ji in Kyoto, Japan

All the historic temples of Kyoto are fascinating, but the Ryoan-ji is extraordinary. It contains the quintessential Zen garden, with fifteen large boulders floating on a lake of raked sand. There's no spot from which a person of normal height can see more than fourteen of the stones, however: an implied, unspoken koan. Contemplating the garden for an extended time encourages a highly charged sense of primed emptiness, exactly what is required for any activity that demands extreme concentration. That state is essential for a conductor, and I find it helpful to use the sense-memory of my visits to Ryoan-ji to recover it.

The balcony of my late father's apartment on Rehov Diskin in Jerusalem

Photography by Atta Wong

My father moved to Israel in the late '70s, and for the last seventeen years of his life lived in a flat on Rehov Diskin in Jerusalem. His block was next to the upscale Kiryat Wolfson development, but much more heimish. On the street side he was on the second floor just above the busy street life, but the rear – with a good-size balcony – was on the cliff wall, far above the Valley of the Cross, with a spectacular view across to the Israel Museum on the far side, the Monastery of the Cross below and the Knesset building in the distance. Inside was the bachelor flat of a frum scientist whose publications ranged from teaching manuals for Talmud to works on biblical archeology, piled from floor to ceiling and from wall to wall with seforim and secular books. Visitors would make their way to the guest room, which they'd share with motors and measuring equipment on the inventor's workbench. Going from inside the flat to the balcony was like emerging from a cave into a magnificent world. ♪

Places I Love is a unique travel-gearred feature that asks artists, musicians, writers and other prominent personalities to share their favorite travel destinations and attractions with readers. Given the unique focus of Asian Jewish Life, both an Asia-based destination and either a city or particular attraction in Israel, are highlighted. It is a chance to see the world in an entirely different way.
